

What is GLACATION?

Students often arrive on campus with a background in community service, and many are interested in continuing to volunteer. They'd like to make a difference in their new community and become leaders and active citizens in the future. In the GLACATION Living Learning Community, students can continue their civic engagement and also learn new skills. Because educate for service is a College goal, too, students in the GLACATION Living Learning Community can immediately become a part of the College's mission. As a member of this community, you will be living and working with others who share your goal of working toward a better world. Members of the community work together with faculty and staff to develop ideas for programs and events. The GLACATION Community is located in Myer Hall.

"What cannot be achieved in one lifetime will happen when one lifetime is joined to another."

- Harold Kushner:

"Friendship is the hardest thing in the world to explain. It's not something you learn in school. But if you haven't learned the meaning of friendship, you really haven't learned anything."

-Muhammad Ali

What Is A Living and Learning Community?

Living and Learning communities are a purposeful attempt to integrate curricular and co-curricular experiences that complement and extend classroom learning. Each community is built around a specific course, series of courses, or area of interest and is structured so that students have a high degree of involvement in its formation. Learning Communities foster faculty and resident interaction that enhances both intellectual and personal growth of its residents. A closeness and sense of community naturally forms in Living and Learning Communities because of the common interest that the residents share from the onset of the academic year. Also, because each community has a unique area of concentration, students work hand-in-hand with hall staff to create programs that focus on their specific needs and interests.
